Many middle-income countries face the danger of remaining in the 'middle-income trap' unless they shift to higher value-added activities that require advanced skills. This book examines the skill and training systems of auto parts producers in Mexico and Turkey and the implications of skilling practices for these nations' development prospects.

FEATURES

- Offers a unique, comparative look at rarely studied cases from Mexico and Turkey, examining their national institutions, links with global value chains, and hiring and training practices
- Explores how the state plays a role in shaping national institutions to mediate the pressures of a global economy in both nations, to very different effect
- Grounded on a theoretical framework as well as case material from 128 interviews with 39 auto parts producers and stakeholders
